I. “New” Water?

5 One of the most precious resources, water, should never be taken for granted. It is not only a major reason that there is life on Earth, but it is essential to our very survival. As the world becomes more and more industrialized, the amount of water used each day increases exponentially. As such, many countries have been forced to think of creative ways to guarantee that they will have enough water for all of their needs.

10 One such place is a small island country in South-East Asia. Known the world over as the “Lion City,” Singapore has been a pioneer in the creation of water sources that are both sustainable and completely renewable. Given that Singapore is a city-state with few natural resources, it has been dependent upon its neighbors for water. However, this supply is insufficient and a cause of tension between Singapore and its major supplier, the peninsula of Malaysia. Thus, the courageous city-state set out to become water independent, relying on what it calls the “Four National Taps.” These taps, which are imported water, water catchment, desalination, and NEWater, make up the whole of Singapore’s water resources.

15 Three of the four taps are easily understood—treating sea water is an example—but what is NEWater? As the name suggests, NEWater is exactly that, a new source for water that is completely contained within the city of Singapore itself. What makes this particular source interesting is the fact that the water comes from an unexpected place, mainly, treated sewage. Though this may sound unthinkable, the process of creating NEWater actually purifies the water more than that coming from natural sources.

20 Water purification for NEWater consists of three steps that create clean, potable water. The first step requires using a filtration system that removes impurities such as bacteria, viruses, or other harmful particles. Next, the water is placed through a process called reverse osmosis. To explain that simply, the water is forced to pass through a special membrane that blocks harmful particles. Finally, NEWater is treated with UltraViolet light to kill any particles or bacteria that may still remain in the water. In the end, extremely pure, safe water is reclaimed.

25 Thanks to the invention of NEWater, Singapore is well on the way to complete water independence. Currently, NEWater provides about 40% of all water used in Singapore, with a pending increase over the next few years.

30 Creative ideas such as NEWater will continue to be necessary, especially in those areas that are heavily developed and populated. The next time you have the chance, think about where your water comes from. Perhaps NEWater is the future for all people on this planet!

71. In paragraph 2, the passage refers to the “Four National Taps.” What is the meaning of tap?
- A. a sound made by hitting a hard surface with your hand
  - B. a valve that when opened releases water
  - C. a device used to extract water from plants
72. The term “NEWater” is an example of which literary device?
- A. personification
  - B. metaphor
  - C. portmanteau
73. The word potable at the start of the fourth paragraph most likely means...
- A. safe to recycle.
  - B. safe to drink.
  - C. unsafe to use.
74. The author’s reference to Singapore as the “Lion City” is...
- A. to show how famous Singapore is.
  - B. to establish the history of Singapore.
  - C. irrelevant information.
75. What is desalination and why does Singapore do this?
- A. Singapore removes salt from the surrounding seawater to create drinking water.
  - B. As an island nation, Singapore is surrounded by water.
  - C. Singapore removes salt from seawater because it is an independent country.
76. From which area does the Lion City receive the majority of its water?
- A. Island Malaysia
  - B. Peninsular Malaysia
  - C. It does not receive water.
77. Why must countries like Singapore develop creative ways to supply water?
- A. Because they have few natural resources of their own.
  - B. Because island nations are surrounded by water.
  - C. Because cities need vast amounts of sewage.

II.

...My sister had an intense way of cutting our bread-and-butter for us, that never varied. First, with her left hand she jammed the loaf hard and fast against her bib—where it sometimes got a pin into it, and sometimes a needle, which we afterwards got into our mouths. Then she took some butter (not too much) on a knife and spread it on the loaf, in 5 an apothecary kind of way, as if she were making a cast—using both sides of the knife, trimming the butter off round the crust. Then, she gave the knife a final smart wipe on the edge and then sawed a very thick round off the loaf which she finally, before separating from the loaf, cut into two halves, of which Joe got one, and I the other.

On that day, though I was hungry, I dared not eat my slice. I felt that I must have 10 something in reserve for my dreadful acquaintance, and his ally the still more dreadful young man. I knew Mrs. Joe's housekeeping to be of the strictest kind, and that I might find nothing available in the safe to take. Therefore, I resolved to put my hunk of bread-and-butter down the leg of my trousers.

The effort it took for me to think of this solution was great. It was as if I had to make 15 up my mind to leap from the top of a high house, or plunge into a great depth of water. And it was made the more difficult by the unconscious Joe. It was our evening habit to compare the way we bit through our slices, by silently holding them up to each other's admiration now and then. Tonight, Joe invited me several times, by the display of his fast-diminishing slice, to enter our usual friendly competition; but he found me, each time, with my yellow
20 mug of tea on one knee, and my untouched bread-and-butter on the other. At last, I realized that I must quickly decide how to make my bread disappear. So, I took advantage of a moment when Joe had just looked at me, and got my bread-and-butter down my leg.

Joe was evidently made uncomfortable by what he supposed to be my loss of appetite, and took a thoughtful bite out of his slice, which he didn't seem to enjoy. He 25 turned it about in his mouth much longer than usual, pondering over it a good deal, and after all gulped it down like a pill. He was about to take another bite, when he saw that my bread-and-butter was gone.

The wonder with which Joe stopped on the threshold of his bite and stared at me, was too evident to escape my sister's observation.

30 "What's the matter now?" said she, smartly, as she put down her cup.

"I say, you know!" muttered Joe, shaking his head at me in a very serious remonstrance. "Pip, old chap! You'll do yourself a mischief. It'll stick somewhere. You can't have chawed it, Pip."

"What's the matter now?" repeated my sister, more sharply than before.

35 "If you can cough any trifle on it up, Pip, I'd recommend you to do it," said Joe, all aghast. "Manners is manners, but still your 'elth's your 'elth."

By this time, my sister was quite desperate, so she pounced on Joe, and, taking him by the two whiskers, knocked his head for a little while against the wall behind him: while I sat in the corner, looking guiltily on.

40 "Now, perhaps you'll mention what's the matter," said my sister, out of breath, "you staring great stuck pig."

Joe looked at her in a helpless way; then took a helpless bite, and looked at me again.

45 “You know, Pip,” said Joe, solemnly, with his last bite in his cheek, and speaking in a confidential voice, as if we two were quite alone, “you and me is always friends, and I’d be the last to tell upon you, any time. But such a —” he moved his chair, and looked about the floor between us, and then again at me — “such a most uncommon bolt as that!”
